A cross section reveals the many parts that are inside of something. Made with oil paint, wood relief and ceramic, the paintings in Cross Section lay open houses, a power station and a neighborhood. Inside are frozen moments that carry a sense of unease and whimsy. Imagined memories, primarily from childhood summers in Germany, populate a space that lives between remembered and invented. In the paintings, the uncertainties of today are transformed into naive scenes that can more easily be cross-examined. Multiple memories are enshrined alongside one another, making it possible to trace connections between events and unsettle the chronological order of memory as a whole.

Niklas Dorsch is a German-American painter based in Brooklyn, NY. Largely self-taught, he has studied at the New York Studio School and the Art Students League and is an artist in residence at AlterWork Studios.
